What are Psychosocial Rehabilitative Services?

Psychosocial rehabilitation (PSR) is the process of restoration of community functioning and well being of an individual who has a psychiatric disability.

The goal of PSR is to help individuals with persistent and serious mental health issues to develop the emotional, social and intellectual skills needed to live, learn, and work in the community with the least amount of professional support.

PSR helps individuals grow beyond the effects of mental health illness. It is a recovery process that helps build a quality of life that focuses on the strengths and potential. The overall goal of PSR is to restore hope to people who suffered major setbacks in self-esteem because of their mental illness.

Who can benefit from psychosocial rehabilitative services?

Individuals who may have experienced repeated psychiatric hospitalizations, lack daily living skills and have limited or non-existent support systems can benefit for psychosocial rehabilitative services. The services are intended to help participants function and remain stable in the community.

What do psychosocial rehabilitation participants receive?

Training on effective strategies to manage their mental/behavioral health conditions

Opportunity to develop and practice daily living skills

Support and guidance to identify and apply for employment that accommodates their level of functioning

Connection to resources, activities, and volunteer opportunities in the community

A supportive environment in which to make friends, build self esteem, and become productive citizens
